

special collections DOUGLAS queen's university AT kingston kingston ontario canada

× 3:4

AN

EXPLANATORY DEFENCE

OF THE

ESTIMATE, &c.

AN

EXPLANATORY DEFENCE

OF THE

ESTIMATE

OF THE

MANNERS

AND

PRINCIPLES

OF THE

T I M E S.

BEING

An APPENDIX to that Work, occasioned by the Clamours lately raised against it among certain Ranks of Men.

WRITTEN

By the AUTHOR of the ESTIMATE, in a Series of Letters to a noble FRIEND.

LONDON:

Printed for L. DAVIS and C. REYMERS, again& Grays-Inn-Gate, Holborn. MDCCLVIII.

AC911.1758.876

FAMILY OF STAMPS

1 2 2 2

Solver and the second of the se

A STATE OF S

: 01

THE STATE OF THE S

AN

EXPLANATORY DEFENCE

OF THE

ESTIMATE, &c.

LETTER I.

My LORD,

have so long honoured me, was never more clearly proved, or more nobly exercised, than in the free and candid Account you lately gave me, of some Exceptions ceptions taken against the Estimate, among certain Ranks of Men in Town, more particularly on the Publication of the second Volume, and fince the Author's Retirement into the Country.

This Intelligence hath indeed alarmed the Writer; and fet him to review his Work with greater Circumspection even than that with which he writ it. "Tis certain, that no Man can expect to hear the frank Opinions of the World, from the World itself. 'Tis, therefore, an Office of the truest Friendship in your Lordship to communicate all you have heard on this Subject. The Objections which you have so fairly stated, I shall answer in their Order; and with equal Pleasure vindicate, where I think myself right; or retract, where I am wrong.

Où

On this Occasion, your Lordship may expect a Series of Letters. This Method will equally alleviate my Trouble in writing, and yours in reading.

LETTER II.

BEFORE I proceed to your Objections, you will give me Leave, my Lord, briefly to state the main Intent or Scheme of the Estimate; in such a Manner as may prove a Sort of general Key to the Objections you have made. For I perceive plainly that many of them proceed from a mere Inattention to, or a total Misunderstanding of the leading Principles of the Work.

And that I ray give your Lordship a just Idea of its main Design, I will give you a short Account of the accidental Rise and Occasion of this Work; the leading Principles of which, are indeed no more B 2 than than a small Part of a much larger Design, of a much more extensive Nature.

THE Writer being convinced both from Books and Observation, that the Happiness and Duration of States depends much less on mere Law and external Institution, and much more on the internal Force of Manners and Principles than hath been commonly imagined; and being of Opinion, that the fundamental and leading Causes of the Happiness and Duration of States had not as yet been enquired into or pointed out, with that Particularity of Proof, Circumstance and Illustration, which fo important a Subject might demand; had for some Time bent his Thoughts on a Defign of confiderable Extent, which might be called " A History and Analysis " of Manners and Principles in their fe-" veral Periods." His general Plan begins with the Examination of favage Life, and

pro-

proceeds through the feveral intermediate Periods of rude, simple, civilized, polished, effeminate, corrupt, prossigate, to that of final Declension and Ruin.

In the Course of this Plan (too extenfive, indeed, for the Mediocrity of the Writer's Talents) a Diversity of Circumstances, almost infinite, have presented themselves. The Rise, Changes, and Progress of Commerce, Arts, Science, Religion, Laws; their mutual Influence, and Effects on each other, and on Manners and Principles; the Characters, Virtues and Vices of Rank, Office, and Profession, in each of the Periods thus delineated; the natural Means by which these Periods generate each other; the Advantages and Disadvantages, Strengths and Weaknesses, which mark and distinguish these several Periods; the most practicable Means of bringing

 B_3

bringing forward the savage and rude Periods towards polished Life, and of bringing back the effeminate and corrupt Periods to the same salutary Medium; above all, the Regulation and strong Establishment of Manners and Principles to this important End;—these, with other subordinate Articles of Research, proved and illustrated by Facts drawn from History, form the Substance of the Writer's general Design.

On this Design he was intent, when the War broke out between BRITAIN and FRANCE; which being very unsuccessful in its Beginnings, on the Part of BRITAIN; he thought he could not, in his private Station, do a better Service to his Country, than in pointing out what to him appeared the fundamental and latent Causes of this ill Success. To this End he singled out so much of his main Design, as immediately related related to the present State of his own Times and Country; endeavouring to convince his Fellow Citizens, that "the Source" of our public Miscarriages did not lie "merely in the particular and incidental Misconduct of Individuals; but in great "Part in the prevailing Character of that "Period in which we live; that is, in the "Manners and Principles of the Times."

Hence alone, the Estimate had its accidental Birth: Let it be chiesly remembered then, that the main Subject of this Estimate is solely "the Essects of present" Manners and Principles on the Duration of the State." This the Writer insisted on so strongly, and repeated so often, that he thought his Readers would certainly carry it along with them: yet he finds, he was mistaken.

В 4 Тне

THE leading Truths, therefore, which in the Course of his Work he has attempted to prove, are these; That exorbitant Trade hath produced exorbitant Wealth; that this hath naturally produced a high Degree of Luxury, and a general Attention to pleasurable Enjoyment among the higher Ranks, among whom the Effects of Luxury must of course first appear. That these natural Effects of Wealth have been naturally attended with public Confequences which tend to the weakening or Diffolution of the State, by turning that general Attention upon pleasurable Enjoyment, which in fimpler Times was bent on Views of Duty. That hence, a general Defect of Capacity, Fortitude, and Principle, did naturally rife; fuch as, in its End, must be fatal, if unchecked in its Progress: and that all the leading Ranks were of course insected with these natural ConConsequences, in some Degree or other, from their very Situation.

THAT another Evil hath conspired with this; and that as this arose from the Abuse of Wealth, so the other was inflamed by this, and arose from the Abuse of Liberty. That our Constitution, excellent in its Nature, was liable to an Abuse, which arose even from its Excellence. That the Principle of parliamentary Influence which was thought or found necessary at the Revolution in Eighty-eight, as a new Principle of Government, had conspired with the Luxury and ruling Manners of the Times, to weaken the national Powers, by raising many Men to Places of the most important Trust, who were in some Respect or other unequal to the Task: And hence the accumulated Danger to the Stability of the Commonwealth.

This is the main Outline of the Author's Design, strip'd of that Particularity and Variety of colouring, which it was necessary to give it, ere it could be made a just and striking Picture of the Times. All that circumstantial Delineation of the ruling Character of each Rank, Condition, Order, or Profession of Men, being indeed no more than what the Writer intended as a Proof in Detail, of these general Principles.

The Reception which the Work hath met with in the World, is a Proof sufficient, how thoroughly the main Body of the Nation is convinced of the general Truth and Utility of the Plan. As to the Execution of it; whoever considers the Nature of the Work; and that in the Course of particular Proof, it was necessary to speak with uncommon Freedom concerning the real State of all Ranks and Orders of Men, will eafily fee that Numbers must be displeased at a Freedom which was perhaps new, but which the very Genius of the Work rendered necessary.

What Foundation this particular Difpleasure of Individuals may have had in Reason, and what in Passion and Self-Partiality, I will now calmly consider; in weighing those Objections which your Lordship hath laid before me.

LETTER III.

YOU fay, my Lord, that "many good "and well meaning People have taken

- " Offence, as being involved in the blame-
- " able Manners of the Times, and there-
- " fore charged with Guilt, as the Enemies
- " of their Country, while they are not con-
- " scious of acting intentionally amiss."—

In reply to this, my Lord, let me briefly quote my Vindication from some Passages in the Book itself. "It is not affirmed or imply'd, in this general Review, that every Individual hath assumed the Garb and Character of salse Delicacy.—As in manly Ages, some will be effeminate, fo, in effeminate Times, the manly Character will be found."—But from the general Combination of Manners and Principles, in every Period of Time, will always result one ruling and predominant Character *."

YET altho' it be true, that the Character of guilty Effeminacy belongs not to all; it feems to the Writer, that none are exempt from some Degree or other of those ruling Manners, which, when indulged beyond a certain Degree, constitute the Character of guilty Effeminacy. He cannot acquit his best and worthiest Friends of some Participation with the Desects of their Time and Country. Nor doth he pretend to be exempt from them himself. Alas, if he did, he must be the blindest and most self-ignorant of all Mortals! These Manners are, in a certain Degree, in-wrought into our very Nature by the Force of early Habit; then become, as it were, a Part of us: and we might as well attempt to divest ourselves of the Modes of Speech, as of the Modes of Thought and Action which are peculiar to our Time and Country*.

^{*} Vol. 1. p. 65.

Thus, as no Period is without its Defects, so by early Habit, we are all necessarily doomed to a Participation of these Defects. Hence, all Characters are imperfect; not only from their internal Frame and Passions; but from their external Habits of Education. But where the Scales fairly preponderate on the Side of Reason and Virtue; there, tho' the Character be impersect, it is not vicious.

^{*} Virtuous and vicious ev'ry Man must be, Few in th' extreme, but all in the Degree: The Rogue and Fool by Fits is fair and wise,; And ev'n the best, by Fits, what they despise.

NAY, not only the worthiest are in some Degree necessarily tinctured with the ruling Errors of the Times; but I will go a Step surther, my Lord, and affirm, "that Men may be involved in the Manners of the Times, to a Degree that is even pernicious, and yet not be justly stigmatized as immoral or unworthy Characters, so as to become justly the Objects of Hartred or Detestation."

To prove that I am not cooking up a new System in my own Defence, different from the Principles of the Estimate, I must again have Recourse to the Estimate itself.

The

The following Paragraph is decifive. "Se"veral Habits, Qualities, and Actions, "which feem innocent in themselves, as "they affect or influence private Life, are "equally or more hurtful than others of a "more odious Appearance, if we confider them as they affect the public "Strength and Welfare. This comes to pass, because the ill Consequences of some Actions are immediate; of others, more distant. The first strike the Imagination, and are seen by all: The latter must be traced up to their Causes by the Use of Reason; and to do this, exceeds the Ta-

GIVE the Author Leave now, my Lord, to apply this Truth fairly and candidly in his own Defence: A Use, which he little dreamt, when he writ it, that he should ever have Occasion to apply it to.

" lents of the Many *."

^{*} Vol. 11. p. 173.

WHEN, therefore, the Author charged his Contemporaries with indulging Manners pernicious to the public Welfare, he never intended to charge ALL who thus indulged them, with any defigned Immorality or Guilt. These Manners, it appears, do not necessarily imply an immoral Character, in the strictest Sense; because, tho they be attended with distant Consequences which are bad, nay perhaps fatal, yet these Consequences are not always perceived or suspected by those who are involved in them. There is, in this Case, no Idea, no Suspicion of any Violation of Duty; the Consequences are perhaps itoo distant to be seen by every Eye; and therefore, strictly speaking, no moral Guilt or Demerit can arise. Yet these Manners (to cite another Passage which may convince you that the Writer's Defence is built on his first Principles) " tho' in Appearance " they are too trite to merit Notice, and

" too trifling for Rebuke, may in their " Tendency be as fatal to the Stability of a " Nation, as Maxims and Manners more

" apparently flagitious *."

Now, these Manners, my Lord, which are thus fraught with hidden and unseen Mischief, ought surely to be laid open in all their Consequences, no less than Manners more apparently flagitious. Nay, there is indeed the greater Necessity for such a Developement, because without it, even the worthy and well-intentioned may be drawn in, while they suspect no such Consequence, to adopt a System of Manners destructive to their Country.

LET the following Paragraph (apply'd, indeed, in the Book itself to a different Purpose) serve as a concurrent Proof of what is here afferted. "The more trite

* Vol. I. p. 29.

Ç

" and

" and trilling the Facts may feem, the more their Consequences are likely to " escape Notice: For Attention is natu-

" rally fixed only on Things of manifest

"Importance. Now, if indeed, notwith" standing this, they be in their Tendency

" as fatal to the Stability of a Nation, as " Maxims and Manners more apparently

" flagitious; then it may be not only a " Task of some Importance, but of some " Delicacy too, to trace them to their

" Confequences and Sources *."

This, my Lord, may be called the fecond Degree, in which the Writer esteems his Country very generally infected with that System of Manners, which he hath attempted to disgrace. But neither in this Degree, does he think that moral Guilt is chargeable on the Delinquents; nor did he ever charge them with it, so as to en-

* Vol. II. p. 54.

deavour

endeavour to render Individuals the Objects of Hatred and Detestation.

But there is a third Degree of Degeneracy, which the Writer esteems the proper Object of severe Censure and Reproof; and that is "When thro' a determined " Pursuit of Gain or Pleasure, manifest " ill Consequences are willfully overlooked " and feafonable Admonitions neglected; " or when these Consequences are seen, "and Admonitions attended to; yet deli-" berately despised, and set at Desiance." Now this Degree of Degeneracy, my Lord, the Author believes and hopes, is not very common: Indeed, the very Tenor of his Work, the very effential Principles on which he fet out, imply and affirm the contrary. For if this had been the Representation he had defigned to make of his Times and Country, he must have regarded and branded them as profligate. Now fo far far from this, that he hath expressly afmed, as a fundamental Principle of his Work, that the Character of the Times is NOT that of profligacy. "The flightest " Observation, if attended with Impartiality, " may convince us, that the Character of " the Manners of this Age and Nation, is " by no means that of abandoned Wick-" edness and Profligacy. This Degree of " Degeneracy, indeed, is often imputed + " to the Times; but to what Times hath " it not been imputed?" Again: " If the previous Estimate, already given, be just; if the Spirit of Liberty, Humanity, and Equity, be in a certain Degree yet left " among us, fome of the most effential " Foundations of abandoned Wickedness " and Profligacy can have no Place *."

YET, my Lord, tho' these atrocious Crimes have no Place among us, so as to † Vol. I. p. 26. * Ib. p. 28.

form

form the Character of a People, the Writer can entertain no Doubt, but there are Characters in every Rank and Station of Life, who may justly deserve the Style of profligate. This is often supposed, in the Course of the Estimate; these Characters, with their Estects on the public Welfare, are incidentally touched on: But as the general Tenor and Complexion of the Work supposes, that the general Character of the Times is totally different from this; no candid Reader, sure, will charge the Writer with imputing this Prosligacy to any particular Character, unless where it is PARTICULARLY AFFIRMED and IMPUTED.

LETTER IV.

SUCH, then, my Lord, is the general Foundation of the Writer's main Defence: A Defence which, if every one had known his Sentiments of Men and C3 Things, Things, as well as your Lordship, he is persuaded he never could have had Occafion to make. And he hath only to apply these general Principles of Desence, to all those Ranks, Conditions, Orders, and Professions, which he hath scrutinized in his Estimate, in order to clear himself of this capital Objection.

Thus, when he affirms, that the leading Ranks in general are infected with the Manners of the Times, he means not to charge the leading Ranks with a general Profligacy or deliberate Guilt. He believes them involved, from their Situation, in a System of Manners, and in very various Degrees of these Manners, which, if not attended to, and curbed in their Excess, will soon or late endanger the Stability of the Commonwealth. But he believes, at the same Time, nay, and knows it too, that many among these leading Ranks are possessed.

possessed of Qualities truly amiable: He only thinks, and hath afferted what he thinks, that they extend not their Views to distant or future Consequences; but heedlessly adopt a System of Manners, which, if unchecked in their Progress, will be attended with such Effects as they themselves would tremble to behold.

He regards the Armies of Great Britain, as being less grossly vicious than in former Times: He applauds their Valour in particular Instances: But he points out, what all indifferent People acknowledge, that the ruling Character of the Times hath naturally drawn them into a System of Manners, which tends to the Destruction of military Spirit.

OF the same Kind are his Strictures on the Navy. Nay, here he acknowledgeth Instances of the most consummate Bravery.

C₄ He

He laments the public Act of their Country, which conspired with the Manners of the Times, and exposed these Gentlemen to the Temptations of Gain, in Preference to Views of Duty. He affirms, that their Remissiness is not properly a personal Guilt, but the natural Effect of their Situation, in such a Period, and in such a Nation; for that "they are brave, hardy, and intrepid, till they rise to the higher Commands; and then the Example and "Manners of the Time insect them *."

HE hath treated his own Profession with the same Freedom and Impartiality: But what is remarkable here, is, that while some cry aloud against him for his ill Usage of his own Profession, others affirm he hath done it more than Justice. For it seems, he hath affirmed that "in the middle Ranks of this Profession there are more good Qualities found than in "any

"any other." This indeed he thinks is true; and refolves it, not into the fuperior personal Virtue of the Professors, but into the Nature of the Protession itself; which, among the middle Ranks, contains and prefents stronger Motives to Virtue, and more effectual Bars to Vice, than any other Protession he knows of. Now, as he judgeth of the Virtues, so doth he judge of the Failings, or, if you will, the Vices of this Order. Perfonal Vices he never thought of meddling with, but only the Vices of Rank and Profession; especially such as the Manners of the Times inflame. Now, it is manifest, that all those of this Profession, who "converse with the World. "and are supposed to make Part of it," without Regard to their particular Rank, stand exposed to Temptations, Follies, and Vices, which the more retired Part of the Profession are not exposed to. In fuch a Case, it is hard to say, where personal and moral Guilt begins; but this he adventures to fay, that many wellmeaning Men in the Profession may be involved in Manners and Habits which are confequentially pernicious, tho' feemingly innecent. This Conduct is often the Effect of Inattention: doubtless, it is sometimes the Refult of deliberate Defign: Where the Boundaries lie, the Writer pretends not to determine: neither indeed is it necessary for his main Purpose, that he should determine; because his main Purpose was only to point out and prevent Consequences: And Consequences will equally arise, from any supposed System of Conduct, whether that Conduct ariseth from mere Inattention, or from moral Depravity of Heart.

WITH Regard to the political Leaders of the People, every Man who reads his Work with an Eye of Candour and Impartiality, will see that the general Drift of his Reasoning is of the same Kind. hath represented the Great, as being too generally immersed in the Pursuit of Pleafure, or of Wealth for the Sake of Pleafure; inattentive to the Interests of the Public, but far from being void of private, moral, and personal Virtues. He acknowledges there are kind Fathers, Mothers, Sisters, Brothers, Friends *; Humanity to Distress he insists on as a ruling Feature of the Times +; and a general Spirit of Equity, in all Things that relate to private Property, between Man and Man. These Virtues, yet left among us, do not only form amiable Characters in the common Intercourses of private Life; but in his Opinion may form a fair Foundation on which to build those public Virtues, the Loss of which he affirms and laments ‡. It is the Idea of a Public that, in his Opinion, is too generally lost: It is the Force of Religion that is too generally no more: It is the Principle of virtuous and public Honour, that in his Estimation is too generally dwindled into unmanly Vanity. Thus, while the Manners of the Times are in many Instances amiable and alluring, as they regard private Life and particular Connexions; the great Bonds of public Strength, the Sinews of the Commonwealth, the Manners and Principles which should be the Soul of the State, should unite all its Members into one Body, vigorous, strong, and terrible to its Enemies, these, in his Opinion, have been relaxed into Weakness, and Dissolution.

^{*} Vol. I. Part I. + Ib. 1 lb.

NAY, even the great ruling Evil of parliamentary Influence, whose Effects, on the national Strength, he hath been so bold in disclosing; and at which, he believes, the Great have taken most Offence;—even this ruling ruling Evil, he believes, hath made its Progress in many Instances, through the mere Blindness, and Inattention of the Parties concerned; who bent only on private Advantage, or perhaps actuated only by the Reputation and Honour annexed to an extensive Influence (a View no ways blameable while confistent with the Welfare of the Public) and not conscious of those Effects which naturally arose from such a Conduct, have often immerfed themselves in all the Wretchedness of Party Violence and Borough-jobbing, without any ill Intention to the State. Nay, in many Cases, he makes no Doubt, but the very private Virtues of the Man have given Birth to the Vices of the Politician; and a misguided Love to Sons, Daughters, Friends, and Dependants, been the Source of political Servitude and Attachments, which, in their unfeen or unregarded Effects, have been of the most fatal Consequence to the Commonweal; by raising Men to public Offices of Trust and Importance, who were unequal to their Station both in Capacity, public Spirit, and other necessary Qualifications. But altho' he thinks thus of many of his Fellow Subjects, he cannot be fo blindly credulous, as to think thus of all: He cannot doubt, but there are some, who would hire themselves out to sale, would obstruct wholesome Measures, would forward bad ones, in order to force themselves into lucrative Employments, and enrich themselves, their Families, and Dependants, tho' the Disorder or the Ruin of the State were the foreseen and certain Consequence. Yet, how many of these Characters may infest the Nation, or where fuch Characters are to be looked for, he neither hath affirmed, nor even infinuated. His Defign was of a far different Nature, " not to make personal Applications, but " to trace acknowledged Facts to their un-" feen

4

"feen Consequences." Whether, therefore, dishonest Intentions were concerned or not, was of no essential Import to his capital Design; which was only to point out the dangerous Effects of such a ruling System of Policy, whether it was founded in blameless or in wicked Intention.

On these Foundations then, my Lord, the Author of the Estimate rests his Defence. He assirms, what, indeed, the greater Part of his Readers are well satisfied of, that he never meant to stigmatize or point out personal Desects or Vices, but only those of Rank, of Prosession, of the Times. He hath in Consequence of this Principle endeavoured to lay open the peculiar Desects incident to each Rank and Prosession; but no where hath he designedly pointed out the particular Men which are chargeable with these Desects. So far is he from resolving these general Desects or Vices into personal and deliberate Guilt, that he thinks it possible, that if the leading Ranks and the middle Ranks of the Nation were to change Places, they might change Characters too: That many of those who are now borne down by the Manners of the Times, might, thro' fuch a Change of Situation, stand entirely clear of them; and many of those who now stand clear of them, might be over-whelmed by their prevailing Influence. But if the Writer was to estimate the moral Merit or Demerit of private and personal Characters (a Thing which came not within his Defign) he would furely go another Way to Work: He would not weigh Consequences, fo much as Intentions: He would confider, who were delinquent thro' Inadvertence, and who thro' deliberate Defign. As he never did this; as nothing of this Kind makes any Part of his Work; as he hath in many Places declared the very contrary; it is evident, that he never meant to charge Individuals with moral Guilt; but, in one Word, "to estimate the Consequences of those Manners and Principles, in which the particular State of the Times hath naturally, in some Degree or other, involved bimself, his Friends, and his Country."

I FORESEE, my Lord, an Objection may rife to the Propriety of this Defence. It may be asked, "If these Manners and "Principles of the Times are properly treated here with Gentleness, why in the Estimate itself are they often treated with "Severity?"

THE Reply to this Objection, my Lord, is easy; and not only consistent with the Nature of the Defence, but indeed effentially founded on it. In this Defence, the author hath considered the Manners and

D Prin-

Principles of the Times, as they affect the Intentions of those who are involved in them: their Intentions, he supposes, to be in many Instances, void of deliberate Guilt: therefore, when he regards them in this Light, he regards them as not chargeable with moral Profligacy, and therefore to be treated with Gentleness.

But in the Estimate itself, he confidered the Manners and Principles of the Times, solely with regard to their Consequences. These, he thought, were pernicious, and fatal: and therefore the Manners and Principles which led to them, were, in his Opinion, to be displayed as being pernicious and fatal; and therefore, in this Regard, to be treated with Severity.

IT is farther urged, it feems, "that "the Writer hath acted with a blameable, Partiality, in painting the ruling Fol"lies."

" lies and Vices of the Times with the utmost, and even aggravated Severity; but hath given few or no Virtues to compensate: whereas an Estimator of the Times ought to have been impar- tial; and should have commended, as " well as blamed."

That Men of Sense and knowledge should raise this objection, is not so easily accounted for. I can only suppose they take Things upon Trust, and have not read the Book. My Lord, the Writer hath given a Catalogue of Virtues, which adorn our Times and Country, so very favourable, that the only candid and decent adversary who hath yet appeared against him, thinks the Picture, in one Circumstance, rather flattering*. Hear what the Writer himself adds on this Subject in the second Volume. "Let us do ^{*} Characteristics of the present political State of Great Britain, p. 203.

D 2 " Justic

" Iuflice to our Age and Country in every « regard: a political Constitution, superior to « all that History hath recorded, or present " Times can boaft: A religious Establish-" ment, which breathes universal Chari-" ty and Toleration. A Spirit of Liber-"ty yet unconquered; a general Humaand Sincerity, beyond any Na-" tion upon Earth: an Administration of " Justice, that hath even filenced Envy:--"These are Blessings which every Engc lishman feels, and ought to acknowce ledge." Sure, my Lord, these are far from general and undiftinguishing Invectives against our Times and Country. Beyond this, the Writer hath expressly affirmed, that in every Rank, Order, and Profession, there are Men who stand diftinguished by their Capacity and Virtue. This Catalogue he could have drawn out by particular Panegyric: but in the View of Things, and with the Intentions with which which he writ, a general Acknowledgment was fufficient; and fuch an enlarged Panegyric, however just, would have been highly blameable. It could have answered but two Purposes; to make himself a favoured Writer among the Great, when he meant to be an honest one; and to bull the higher Ranks in that flattering Stupor in which they were already funk. The first of these he was not sollicitous about: the fecond he held distant. Mankind were to be awakened and alarmed. This could not be done by dwelling on obsequious Representations. Soft and gentle Touches had been ineffectual: The Success of the Stroke depended on the Strength and Boldness. This was one of those particular Occasions, when it became his Duty, not only to cry aloud, but to spare not. The Diseases of the Times called for fuch a Conduct. The Seafon was favourable: it was the Hour of Sickness, and the Time to alarm.

D 3 The

The national Distresses and Disgraces had already awakened the Fears of serious Men: This, then, was the Time to point out the Causes of the Mischief, and its Cure. These Fears were not confined to Men of Speculation and the Closet; but public Men and Ministers faw and avowed the ruling Evils; which were freely and boldly exposed in the Senate, as they have been by the Writer from the Press. This was the Time for honest Men of every Rank, to join with those Men of public Station in so laudable a Work, and to fecond and fupport their Endeavours for a general Reformation. The GREAT, then, were to be rouzed from their Lethargy; the PEOPLE led to fee the Source of Danger, and to prevent it. The View, therefore, was honest and laudable; the Means dangerous only to bim that used them. The Writer may be found, indeed, to have judged ill ill for himself, in the Language of worldly Prudence; but a Man who risks what is commonly held most dear, from a conscientious and fixed Resolve to do what he thinks his Duty, may seem reasonably intitled, at least to the Excuse of those who wish to see good Manners and Principles prevail. Some, no Doubt, may think he hath acted an imprudent Part, and sacrificed his chief Interests: but it is a Mistake, my Lord:
for he hath ever held his chief Interests to lie in a Perseverance in the Paths of Duty.

LETTER V.

So much for the Writer's general Defence. You tell me next, my Lord, that fome People have found the Appearance of an Inconfishency, "While he delineates the Times as felfish, and yet admits them to be friendly, charitable, and humane."

D 4

This

This Objection ariseth (like most of the rest) from a Misapprehension of his Plan: His Defign, was to confider the general Character of his Contemporaries, as they stand related to the Public. Now, in this Light he cannot but regard the general Character of the Times as felfish. We have not that real and generous Concern for the national Welfare, which we discover in Behalf of our Friends, or Individuals in Distress. Doth not the following Circumstance demonstrate the Truth of this Character? That while large and generous Subscriptions are carried on for the Relief of all Manner of private Distress, most Men grudge what they are called upon to contribute toward the public Exigencies. They pay, when they are compelled to pay, with Murmurs and Reluctance. I mean this of the fuperior Ranks: The poor Farmer, Labourer, and Mechanic pays, without rehis pining, the Taxes on his Candles, his Salt, and his Shoes, tho' they are Articles neceffary to his Subfistence. But did the higher ranks shew their public Zeal, when the Wisdom of the Legislature chose that Article of Luxury, a Coach or Chariot, as proper to support a moderate Tax? Did each Man press forward to take his trifling Share of the general Burthen, and to contribute a Mite from his Abundance? When the Pomp of the loaded Side-board became another Object of a moderate Tax, did the Owners rejoice in this Opportunity of contributing to the Wants of the Public? Yet this was not only called by those who projected it, a Tax upon Honour, but in Reality it was fo; fince, in the very Nature of it, it could not be made compulfory. Those who knew the Manners of the Age forefaw and fore told the Confequences of it; and, in Fact, the public Honour of some among the Great was found, on this this Occasion, so equal to their public Spirit, that the Tax has produced a mere Trifle. Yet, it feems, the Sense of Shame could produce, what public Honour and public Spirit failed to produce; for I am told, that the Revenue arising from one of these taxes received a fudden and most astonishing Increase, from an Order of the House of C. that the Names of those who had paid it should be laid before them. Those who would neither obey the Law, nor support the Public, were afraid of being exposed to the Shame of having discovered that they failed in either: they were content to Do what they were ashamed to have it said they had done. It is, in Truth, owing, in great Part to the same Turn of Thought, that so much Offence hath been taken, amongst the higher Ranks, at the Truths delivered in the Estimate. They see, the Representations there made are unfavourable to the Conduct, perhaps of themselves, hut but at least, of many of their Friends, whose private Qualities they esteem and love: How their public Conduct affects the Interests of their Country, they seldom enlarge their Views so far as to consider: and hence, a Writer, who separates their public Conduct from their private, and considers the Actions of Men, only as they regard his Country, cannot possibly fail of incurring their Displeasure. The Reason, my Lord, was assigned in the second Volume: "Enlarged Views of Benevolence" are quite beyond the Reach of such a "People."

LETTER

LETTER VI.

Y O U R Objections which follow next, are chiefly personal: However, as they have been made, they shall be answered. You say, my Lord, it hath been asked, " Who appointed this Man a national Preacher?"—Now, this Expression is in Truth metaphorical: The literal and proper Manner of putting the Question, if any Doubt arises on the Matter, is this: " Who gave this Man Authority to speak " his Thoughts on national Affairs?"-When the Thought is thus divested of Figure, and given in mere literal Expreffion, you fee, that any modest and sensible Englishman would blush to ask the Question. It is doubting of that common Right, which every Englishman demands, and is possessed of. This Privilege the Writer hath exerted in common with Hundreds dreds of his Time and Nation. By what Motives other Men may have been determined, he leaves to themselves; for own Part, he spoke, because he thought he faw the ruling Errors of his Country. 'Tis certain, that in Point of Opinion he hath a great Majority in his Favour: but he never expected to find that Majority among those Ranks, where the ruling Errors are supposed to lie. And if it be true, as the Writer often suggests, that all national Failures begin among the higher Ranks, 'tis certain, that a declining Nation may flide down to Ruin, before a national Preacher be in Form appointed: Or if he was, it may be prefumed, his System of Manners and Principles would be formewhat curioufly modeled and prescribed; and would be more likely to help forward the ruling Evils, than to cure them.

LET us conclude then, my Lord, that whoever has the Power, has likewise the Right, to command the national Attention. There never was any Period in any State, where Reformations of some Kind were not wanting. The great Point is, not as is commonly done, and with great Applause, to declaim, in a vague Manner, against the Iniquity of the Times, (a Kind of Rhetorick which strikes the Ear, but never the Heart) but to point out the ruling Errors and Corruptions with fuch a Particularity of Circumstance, that every Delinquent, in every Rank, shall fee, and be made to feel, his own. This, my Lord, is the Way to awaken, to convince: thus alone the Mind and Conscience is turned upon itself: Few Men are so deliberately vile, as to withstand the Convictions of their own Reason: The great Source of Wickedness is Self-deceit. But this Method of convincing, the Writer was well aware, is a Task which (however useful to the Public) will bring no Favour to the Individual who undertakes it.

THE next Objection you tell me of, my Lord, may feem to wear a little more than this, the Face of Reason. The Objection is, that, "confidering the Writer's " private Station, he takes too much up-" on himself in his Censures on the Great; " that he is insolent, dogmatical, arrogant, " affuming."—With Regard to this, my Lord, the Writer protests, that so far as concerns himself, he is content to be thought as inconfiderable, as everyReader choofeth to make him in his own Eyes. He never obtruded any Authority but that of Reafon: He defired the World only to read the Book, and weigh the Truth of it. If to be the Means of conveying some plain and necessary Truths to the World, without attacking the private Character of Individuals.

Individuals, be Infolence, Arrogance and Dogmatism, the Writer stands guilty of the Charge: But if this be not the case, if the Accusation be founded in the mere Want of those frequent and common Apologies, Reserves, Exceptions, Salvo's and Douceurs, by which Writers are apt to court the self-love or Malice of the World, and by which every Reader is happily prevented from applying any thing to bimself; The Writer apprehends, that in this Case he is not assuming, but that he did his Duty in being explicit and intelligible.

THERE is, in this respect, an essential Difference between Writing and Speaking. The Speaker's private Rank and Character is necessarily attended to; because from his personal Presence, personal Considerations will (contrary to what is right) intermix themselves. A Writer, it hath been generally supposed, has the Privilege to be exempt from these personal Distinctions and Restraints; and if he loses the Benefits of superior Station on one Hand, on the other the Want of them ought not to be imputed. On the public Stage, all those who address the Publick are, in Rank, equal: Or rather, it is the Province of Reason, and not of Norroy King at Arms, to determine their Superiority. Are the Follies and Vices attacked, of a public or private Nature? If public, they are of public Cognizance; and the Accuser is not to be told. that he has no Right to accuse, because he is of an inferior Station: It is enough, that he is a Fellow-Member of the Community. If the Happiness of his Country be at Stake, it matters not whether it be endangered by the Defects of the Great or Vulgar. In such a Case, the Point of Ceremony must give way to the public Welfare; and the fole Question worth debating is only, whether the Author speaks the Truth in such a Manner, as may be E of

of most effectual Service to his Country? He gives in his Evidence and Proof to the great Court of Judicature, the World; and this he hath a Right to do in the same unreserved Manner, whether the Ranks accused wear Aprons, Bands, Cockades, or Coronets. In a Word, the Writer of the Estimate, and the private Man, are in this Respect, two different Characters. The latter knows his Station, and hopes he conducts himself in it with Humility and Propriety. The Persons of the Great he treats with due Respect, and in Point of Decency, (and perhaps of Dignity too) maintains his Distance: As a Writer, he is a little more familiar with their Vices; when they interfere with the Welfare of his Country; because these are not the Objects of his Reverence; not even of his external Reverence, as they have no Place, Rank, or Titles of Honour legally annexed to them (that he knows of) in this KingKingdom. As his Censures therefore are general, and nor particular, he thinks, he may arraign the Vice, and yet preserve due Respect to the Man.

However; tho' he held this Principle of Conduct to be necessary, and therefore just; yet, like every other Principle, it certainly hath its proper Bounds: Nor does the Writer pretend to erect himself into an absolute Judge of the Propriety of his own Conduct, in every Instance. All that he is fure of, is only this; that what he writ in this Kind, was the pure Refult of his prefering Truth and public Utility to the Favour of any Ranks or Individuals whatever: And if, in the Rapidity of Compofition, any feeming Excesses of this Kind fell from his Pen; whoever may think they fee fuch Excesses, will do him no more than Justice, if they ascribe them to E_2 the the Warmth of a well-intentioned Mind, heated with the Importance of its Subject.

LETTER VII.

PUT you add, my Lord, that suppofing the Representations just, which the Writer of the Estimate hath given of his Times and Country, it is farther objected, "that as the Book has been translated into foreign Tongues, and made its Way on the Continent, it has given Advantage and Encouragement to our Enemies, by painting this Nation as being sunk in Esteminacy."

ALAS! my Lord, our Enemies knew our Weakness and Degeneracy before: the national Disgraces had proclaimed it. As to the Causes and Remedies of this political Degeneracy, the Knowledge of these could only affect ourselves. We might might reap Advantage, (if we so pleased) by being led to the Knowledge and Sense of these: Our Enemies had already reaped all the Advantages of Information, from the mere Knowledge of the Fact. Is a Nation to go quietly down to Ruin, without one awakening Voice to rouze it from its fatal Lethargy, merely through Fear that our Enemies should take Advantage? They saw we were asleep: they had surprized and attacked us in our Slumber: Sure, it could not be dangerous or hurtful, to awaken from its Dream a Nation fo exposed and attacked. Nor could it lessen that Nation in another's Eyes, to see there was one bold enough to attempt it.

But, it feems, "the Alarm was fo "ftrong, that it was in Danger of throw- ing the Nation from a State of blind "Security, into a State of Despair."

E 3

This, my Lord, is the vague Language of undiftinguishing Objectors; and sayours little of the Knowledge of Human Nature. Would to God, the Feelings of the Guilty were fo delicate; but to bring that Part of the Nation which was funk in blind Security, to the opposite Extreme of Despair, is, by no Means, an easy Task. There are many intermediate Periods to be gone through, of Doubt, Suspicion, Fear, Despondency, 'ere the dissolute Mind can arrive at this Extreme. Rouze the Secure and Luxurious as feverely as you can, you will hardly awaken them into the first Stage of Doubt. A Twitch by the Ear, or the Scratch of a Pin, may be felt by a People whose Sensibility is firong; while their lethargic Leaders, funk in Indolence of Manners, may be Proof against the Application of red-hot Pincers.

This, my Lord, is a clear Reply, with regard to the higher Ranks, and Leaders of the People: With respect to the People themfelves, the thinking Part had already been awakened into Fear, if not to Despondency, by the public Difgraces. I repeat it, my Lord, that " the Nation stood aghast at its own " Misfortunes; but like a Man, starting " fuddenly from Sleep, by the Noise of " fome approaching Ruin, knew neither " whence it came, nor how to avoid it *." What then was the Confequence of this Book? It was, to investigate the real Causes of those national Disgraces which had alarmed us; and, together with the Causes, to suggest the Cure. Could this tend to drive a People to Despair? On the contrary, it naturally led them to a rational and lively Hope: For, together with the ruling Evils, the natural Remedy was pointed out. My Lord, the Nation

* Vol. I. p. 150.

E 4

tion faw the Remedy; they have claimed it, and already feel its powerful Effects.

LETTER VIII.

YOUR Lordship says, it is farther objected, that "if the Substance of the "Work was true, whence could such "Clamours arise against it, even among any Rank or Party of Men?"

The Objections already stated by your Lordship, afford a Reply, in part, to this general Question.—Worthy Men may have taken Offence at the Work, from a Confciousness of their own innocent Intentions, and a Misapprehension of the Author's main Design: They see not the Consequences of those Manners in which they are involved; and therefore may think it unjust, that these Consequences should be charged upon their Conduct, which is intentionally blameless.—Farther, that sparing Hand, with which the Author thought it necessary to mingle Panegyric in his Work, hath undoubtedly been the Occafion of much Discontent.—Again, the open and unreserved Manner in which the Estimate is written; the seeming Danger of telling so much political Truth to the World, supposing the Representations true; —All these, my Lord, have been undoubtedly regarded as improper or imprudent Steps; and declaimed against, as such, by Men of good Intentions.

FOR a Reply to these Objections, your Lordship is referred to the preceding Letters. There are other Causes of Clamour, I apprehend, of a very different Nature; and I will point out these with the same Freedom.

ONE Source of Clamour hath been the obstinate Blindness of the dissolute, in every Rank and Station; who, being determined to proceed in the beaten Track of Pleafure, without Regard to Consequences, do therefore naturally dislike those who display them.

AGAIN, my Lord, the more Truth appears in a Work of this Nature, by which the Interests of Individuals are so nearly affected, the more Enemies the Work must have among a certain Party of Men: I mean all that Party who look no farther than themselves, and are watching to plunder the Public for their own private Emolument. How large a Party this may be, or where they may lie, the Writer leaves to your Lordship to determine. 'Tis enough to observe here, that these Men, seeing their own Plans of selfish Interest observed.

obstructed by the open Avowal of the Truths thrown out so freely to the Public in this Estimate, must naturally rise against the Author, and fasten upon him like a Nest of Hornets.

Besides these Causes of Offence and Clamour, I will beg Leave to whifper another in your Lordship's Ear: It is a Secret, my Lord, which you Great People are not often given to hear or understand: Many of the Dependants of the Great, and whom they are pleased to call their Friends, are in Truth no more than their Flatterers in Difguise. They have not that generous Regard to the real Advantage of their Lords and Masters, which they so zealoufly pretend: Their own Interest is the Compass they steer by: they are therefore glad to take Advantage of the common Partialties of human Nature, to difgrace grace all Men in the Opinions of those whom they seem to serve, who dare point out to them even the Semblance of an Error.

LETTER. IX.

YOU tell me farther, my Lord, that "a particular Passage hath given much Offence to the Universities and their Friends; in which a general Centure is thrown on the Heads of Columbia."

On this, therefore, the Author thinks it necessary to explain himself more particularly; as no Man entertains a truer Regard to the real Honour and Welfare of these learned Bodies, than himself.

WITH Regard, therefore, to what he apprehends to be the most material Part of

of the supposed Charge against these Gentlemen, that is, " their not sufficiently re-" collecting the original Purpose of Col-"lege Government;" he finds that his Meaning hath been strangely mistaken or perverted. He was not, in that Passage, questioning the legal and statutable Admini-Aration, but pointing out the defective Form of our College-Institutions; and proposing a Method, by which their Defects might in some Measure be remedied, thro' the voluntary Care and Superintendance of the Heads, in certain Circumstances, to which he believes they are not obliged by Statute. He had been pointing out the Use and Necessity of a Subordination of Instructors; in which, one Party should be an Asfistance and a Check to another; and brought the great Schools, as Examples (in some Degree) of this proposed Method of In-Struction. Whoever considers this Circumstance here infisted on, will find it of the last last Consequence in all public Institutions: It keeps all Parties alive and active in their respective Spheres; who, without these awakening Checks, are apt to flide down into unsuspected Negligence. Now, the general Want of these continued and subordinate Checks, are, in his Opinion, a capital Defect in our University Establishments. He therefore took, what he thinks an allowable Freedom, in pointing out this ruling Defect: Which, as it is not generally obviated by the Governors of Colleges, as they do not regard it as a Part of their Office, to instruct either the Tutors or the Pupils, he could not refolve this Omission into any Cause more excusable, than their " not recollecting the " orginal Purpose of College Govern-" ment."

As to the general Causes of this Inattention, which in the Writer's Opinion, implies implies no positive Demerit*, he supposes it to arise from Impersections common to Men, and to Men of Worth and Probity; as explained in the Beginning of this Defence +. With Regard to certain particular Attentions hinted at, more especially to Cards and Entertainments; if, formerly, fome growing Attentions of this Kind fell under his Observation in one of the Universities, such as the worthiest Men might inadvertently fall into, he is informed that they are now ceased. His Remark, therefore, not being applicable to the present Time, becomes a Mistake in Point of Fact; and as fuch he freely devotes and offers it up, a voluntary Sacrifice to Truth and Justice: leaving it to those who are infallible, to upbraid him with the Acknowledgment of an Error.

^{*} This was manifestly imply'd in the subsequent Paragraph, where the Author declared, he meant no personal Investive.

[†] See Letter III.

LETTER. X.

PROCEED, my Lord, to your last Objection. It seems, "The Freedom" with which the Character of a famous "Minister is treated, hath been the Occasion of much Offence to his Friends and Adherents, which form a large and powerful Party in this Kingdom."

As to the mere Matter of Offence, my Lord, there is no preventing it in certain Cases. But if the Writer was to calculate Numbers on this Occasion, he finds the Majority would consist of those who think he hath treated the Character of this Minister at least with sufficient Lenity. 'Tis certainly a Kind of Presumption in his Favour, that one Part of the Nation thinks he hath allowed too little; and others, too much, to this deceased Minister.

BE that as it may; the Investigation of this Minister's Principles and Conduct is certainly of national Concern: It is of great Importance to this Kingdom, that it be known whether his political System be falutary or destructive: therefore the Character of his Administration not only may, but ought to be freely and fairly canvassed, for the Conviction and Benefit of the Whole.

HAD the Writer treated this Minister's Character with Contempt, there had been some Pretence for Blame: As he studiously avoided every thing of this Kind, he cannot but be astonished, that Men of Candour and fair Intentions can be offended at his cool and dispassionate Reasonings on this Subject. He never entertained any personal Dislike to this Minister, his Friends, or Adherents. On the contrary, he knows some of them to be Men of Worth and Honour, the Friends of Liberty and their

F

Country; and for whose Characters, he were both unjust and insensible if he had not the highest Deserence: If he differs from these Gentlemen in Point of Opinion, they are satisfied he does it from the Convictions of his own Reason. They know, he proceeds on the same Principles of Liberty with themselves; that he only dissens in his Conclusions; and are too just and generous, to dislike him for throwing out his Sentiments so freely, on a Subject of such Importance.

Is the Writer mistaken in his Opinions concerning the Conduct of this Minister? The Press is open to every body: Why then is Clamour spread, instead of rational Confutation? To tie down the Nation to this System, to forbid or discourage rational Inquiry into its Tendency, would be to erect a political Tyranny in the State. If it is clear then, that the Writer's Intentions tions are honest, the Friends of this Minister will find it equitable to make Allowance for Difference in Opinion. What they contend for in Religion, will they deny in Politics? Certainly, my Lord, the Maxims of arbitrary Power sit with the worst Grace on the declared Patrons of Freedom:

It were perhaps unfair to charge any of the more generous Part of this deceased Minister's Friends, with joyning in the Clamours raised on this Occasion. That no candid and equitable Mind can be disgusted at his Conduct, he concludes from the generous Professions of a late Writer, so nearly connected with this Minister, that his Evidence must be allowed above all Suspicion. "This Freedom of Discussion on the Dead of any Rank, or however consecrated by the Authority of great Names, or even by the Esteem of Ages, every Man ought to be at Liberty to ex-" ercise. The greatest Men certainly may " be mistaken; so may even the Judgment " of Ages, which often takes Opinions " upon Trust. No Authority, under Di-" vine, is too great to be called in Que-" ftion: And however venerable Mo-" narchy may be in a State, no Man ever " wished to see the Government of Let-" ters, under any Form but that of a Re-" public. As a Citizen of that Common-" wealth, I propose my Sentiments for " the Revision of any Decree, of any ho-" norary Sentence, as I think fit: My Fel-" low Citizens, equally free, will vote ac-" cording to their Opinions ."-Such are this Gentleman's free and generous Principles on the like Occasion: And the Writer is well perfuaded, that this honourable Person is too equitable to refuse that Privilege to another, which he fo rationally assumes to himself. LET-^{} Preface to Mr. WALPOLE's Catalogue of royal and noble Authors.

LETTER. XI.

OTHERS, it feems, my Lord, "think "it fomewhat strange that a Man should step out of his own Profession, and engage in a Province in which he was no way particularly bound to concern himself."

In reply to this, my Lord, feveral Confiderations may be alledged. The Writer perhaps might content himself with the old Apology of " Homo fum; humani nihil " a me alienum puto:" He may alledge, that as the Causes of the Duration of the State are the main Object of his Enquiry, the Preservation of the Christian and Protestant Religion become, among other Things, the natural Objects of his Attention and Pursuit. Above all, my Lord, he infifts, that the System of Policy, which he recommends and enforces, is not only religious, but moral: and therefore, to endeavour F3 deavour to establish this System, is to endeavour to establish the public Happiness of Mankind on the folid Basis of Virtue, which is the End of Religion itself. He therefore thinks, that both in this, and in the Purfuit of his greater Plan, he is, to the utmost of his Power, ferving the Cause and End of Religion and Christianity; the main Drift of his general Defign being only to prove, that the most effectual Way to render Kingdoms happy, great, and durable, is to make them virtuous, just, and good. In this Point he confirms himself on the Authority of an excellent Prelate, whose political Refearches were of like Tendency. " As the Sum of human Happiness is sup-" posed to consist in the Goods of Mind, " Body and Fortune, I would fain make " my Studies of some Use to Mankind, " with Regard to each of these three Par-" ticulars; and hope, it will not be thought " faulty or indecent in any Man, of what

" Pro=

Profession soever, to offer his Mite to" wards improving the Manners, Health,

" and Prosperity of his Fellow-Creatures*."

LETTER XII.

SUCH, then, my Lord, is the Writer's Reply to the several Objections which you tell me have been urged against his Estimate. How far it may be satisfactory he pretends not to determine; but leaves every Man to weigh it with candid Freedom.

GIVE me Leave now, my Lord, to close this Defence with a few Observations, which may still farther tend to clear the Doubts of those who have started the Objections.

LET them confider, my Lord, that in a Subject so wide, multifarious, and complicated,

* Dr. Berkley's Mifc. p. 118.

F 4

cated, as that of the Manners and Principles of a wealthy and luxurious Nation, there are not perhaps two Individuals of that Nation, whose Opinions do altogether Every Man that examines fuch coincide. a Subject, proceeds not only on a View of Facts, but on a Set of Principles too, in fome Degree different from those of every other. The Body of the Nation, which hath been so partial in Favour of this Estimate, should they compare their particular Opinions, would find them widely different in many Circumstances: and those among the higher Ranks who have diffented, should they enter into the same critical and minute Comparison of each others Thoughts, would find them equally discordant. If so, my Lord; is not here a manifest Reason for mutual Forbearance, where Opinions clash? And who will deny that it was a Task of the greatest Difficulty, to steer thro' such a Sea of Doubt, Doubt, where (though the Facts lie open to every Man's Observation) every Man forms an Opinion peculiar to himself. The great Outlines, the essential Truths, the leading Principles of such a Work may be acknowledged to be just by Thousands, who, amidst that infinite Variety of Circumstances glanced at in the Course of it, may have particular Opinions different from the Author and each other. All, therefore, that a modest Writer will pretend in such a Case to give, or a modest Reader expect to find, will be a good deal of Truth, and a little Error.

In Consequence of this, my Lord, confider farther, how often and how naturally particular Passages must necessarily be objected to, in such a Work, while the general Truths and leading Principles, on which the Work is founded, are totally overlooked. For every Reader erects himself felf into a Judge of the particular Remarks made, and pronounces on them by the Standard of his own Judgment, formed upon his own Observation and Principles: While, among the Multitude of Readers, even of those who mean well, an extended Discernment of Things, and the Comprehension of a general Plan, is not always to be found. How easy a Task then, my Lord, and how natural to weak, to vain, or ungenerous Minds, to throw out Objections to particular Parts, without any Regard had to the main Tenor, Extent, and Disposition of the Whole?

Besides the Nature of the Subject, there was a farther Difficulty, arifing from the Danger either of too general, or too particular Expression. Had the Writer declaimed in a vague and undistinguishing Manner, on the Errors and Vices of the Times, he had failed of his main Intent, which was, to point point out where the ruling Errors and Vices lay: Had he fingled out Individuals, he had justly incurred the Censure of personal Invective. What then was left for him to do? He only saw one proper Expedient; which was, to give the predominant or leading Character of the several Ranks concerned; yet to admit (in general Terms) that in each Rank there were Exceptions to this leading Character. The very Intention of his Work forbad him to dwell at large on these Exceptions *: And besides this main Reason, another presented itself: Had he professedly singled out every Individual in every Rank and Station, whose Conduct deserved Praise; those who had been passed in Silence, might probably have upbraided him with personal Reproach. He judged it best, therefore, in general Terms, to admit Exceptions, but to leave it to every Man's particular Judgment, to determine where these Exceptions lay.

^{*} See above, Letter IV. p. 37.

LETTER XIII.

HUS, my Lord, the Writer hath endeavoured to explain and defend his Estimate: in which he needed not to have been so sollicitous, had it been true what it feems, hath been infinuated to your Lordship, that "the Work is not properly " his own; that he hath only delivered the Sentiments of other Men, and been "the mere Instrument of conveying their " Principles to the Public." But he here affures your Lordship, in the most solemn Manner, that the whole of this Estimate was the fole Refult of his own Reason, uninfluenced by the Advice, or Direction of any Friend whatever: And that, indeed, he thought the Subject of fo delicate a Nature, that it would have been

unge-

ungenerous to have involved any Friend in the personal Consequences which he forefaw it might produce. Had no disagreeable Effects attended the Publication, he should not have judged it necessary to make this Avowal; but as the Clamour and Displeasure of certain Ranks have been the Consequence of its Appearance and Success, he thinks it a Duty incumbent on him to clear every Friend of this groundless Imputation; and declares, that whatever may appear in it either inadvertent, or erroneous, the Whole is to be attributed to himself alone; to the Overflowings of his own Zeal, thrown out to the World without Disguise, Expectation, or Fear; and bent, not against Persons, but against the predominant Errors, Follies, and Vices of his Time and Country. His Work hath had the Fate which might reasonably be expected: it hath been read, approved, diffented from, and remiled. reviled. For the Conviction of those who have candidly dissented, the Publication of these Letters may be of Use: But when the Writer considers, by whom his Work hath been approved, and by whom reviled, as the first of these Parties desire no Reply, so the latter deserve none: They have both done his Work all the Honour that is in their Power to give; and he cannot but esteem its Fate to have been peculiarly bappy. The worst that he wishes to his worst Enemy, is Honesty and a better Mind.

Upon the whole, my Lord, the Writer can but declare his upright Intentions, and leave the World to judge of their Propriety and Success. He would desire his Countrymen to remember the generous Maxim of a true Politician, "that a Patriot will admit there may be honest Men, and that honest Men may differ: And that, "where "Where the Heart is right, there is true "Patriotism *." He knows, it is the Principle of many good Men, that all Attempts towards Innovation, of whatever Kind, are dangerous. For himself, he is of a different Opinion: He thinks that seeming Innovation is, in many Cases, no more than the necessary Means of preventing a gradual and unsuspected Change of Things for the worse, which inevitably steals on in every State, if not checked by timely and resolute Applications.

So far is the Writer from imagining, with the Herd of Politicians, that there is no Virtue nor good Intention in any but those who approve that System of Politicks which He espouses; that on the contrary, he makes no Doubt, but some of the Great, who had not the Courage to combat the ruling Evils of the Times, wished sincerely to compass such an End, but judged the End unattainable. He is, therefore, the more furprised that Individuals should take Offence at this Part of his Work, because it is pointed, not against the Conduct of Individuals, but against the common and ruling Errors of the Times. He believes there are upright Men of all Parties, and only wishes they would believe so of one another. His Approbation or Disapprobation is not of Men, but Measures: And he is well persuaded, that many of those who once thought the present Measures of Government impracticable, begin now to fee the Possibility, as well as the great Importance of carrying on the public Affairs, on a higher Principle than that of venal Influence.

Dr. Berkley's Maxims.

So fudden and so great is the Change in the Appearance of our public Affairs, in Consequence of this sudden and couragious Check given to the ruling Manners and Principles of the Times, that the Writer hath been feriously asked, " Whether " the rifing Courage of the Nation, our for-" midable Armaments, and the gallant Spi-" rit of several young Men of Fashion and Fortune, are not fo many Confutations " of the Principles advanced in the Esti-" mate?" Seriously, my Lord, the Writer of the Estimate is right glad to be so CON+ FUTED. Had these Appearances risen before the Publication of his Work, he might justly have been accused of Partiality and Misrepresentation. But as it is confessed, that these Appearances are but now rising, he will only defire his Objectors to look back to the Estimate itself, and consider whether they are not rifing on the very Principles there urged, delineated, and foretold. The Writer did indeed believe, he forefaw, nay he foretold, that " NECESSITY alone could " bring back effeminate and unprincipled " Minds from their Attachments to Gain and Pleasure *." Nay, he foretold the very Means: " The Voice of an uncor-" rupt People, and a GREAT MINISTER +." Cast your Eye back, my Lord, to no very distant Day, and be You the Judge, what was the Distress, and what the Necessity of the Time: Had not a general Dissolution of Manners and of Principle disordered, nay, almost unhinged the State? This it was, that united the Voice, the legal Representations, of an uncorrupted People: That united Voice, steady, not factious loyal, yet couragious—was heard and approved by a GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN: The expected Minister was found; and a coercive Power hath thus appeared from the Throne, fufficient to controul the Blindness and Folly of the dissolute and thoughtless among the higher Ranks, and to lead them to falutary Measures and their own Safety:

MARK the Effects of this uniting Power: private Good gives Way to public: the fe† Vol. I. p. 221.

veral

weral Ranks affume a Spirit and Fervor unknown before: Fear of Shame, and Thirst of Honour, begin to spread thro' our Fleets and Armies; and our growing Youth seem already to catch the kindling Fire. In a Word, the national Strength is awakened, and called forth into Action: The Genius of Britain seems rising as from the Grave: he shakes himself from the Dust, assumes his ancient Port, and Majesty of Empire, and goes forth in his Might to overwhelm our Enemies.

I CANNOT conclude, my Lord, without feriously recommending to your particular Notice and Regard, two Observations, (which contain, indeed, the Substance and End of the Estimate itself) arising from the present State of our public Affairs. The first is, that by proper Exertions and well-directed Applications, the ruling Evils of an effeminate Period may be controused: The Second is, that under our present Constitution.

tion, the national Affairs may be carried on with Honour to the Crown and Success to the Kingdom (a Truth which, not long ago, many serious Men did not believe) on a higher Principle than that of corrupt Influence.

However, let us not be intoxicated with the Appearances of Success: The Tree may blossom, and yet be blasted. The ruling Defects and Evils of the Times are for the present controlled indeed, but not extirpated. The Remedy, tho' it begins to take Effect, is yet no more than temporary: The Distemper lurks, tho' the Symptoms begin to vanish. Let those who wish well to their Country, then, be watchful, and prepared against a Relapse. 'Tis something, to have check'd the Discase at its Criss; the perfect Cure will require the Attention and Labour of an Age.

FINIS.

